

About Bromme:

Bromme was born in New Orleans but having lived on the island of Manhattan for many years, he is much more a peripatetic New Yorker than a son of the Big Easy. He has also lived a good portion of his life abroad in such far-flung countries as Colombia and China; he is fluent in French, Spanish and Mandarin. An incurable adventurer, he loves red wine, is fascinated with shooting stars and as has seen somewhere in the seven seas. Bromme is well known for his torrid love affair with the ellipsis.

Bromme has written two books (journalistic style, non-fiction, self-published) which captured the plight of the aging Chinese population and expressed with a great deal of human sentience. The books were produced in China and USA, with the Chinese versions well received. His current manuscript, The Triple Heart, is a work of literary fiction and follows the life of a young woman who perseveres through unimaginable hardship. It is a unique story of one woman's journey to self-actualization; a singular woman whose courage, hope and faith lead her away from the easy path of victimhood and onto one of self-reliance.

Prior to his writing career, Bromme was health care investment banker who worked at a large money center bank. He left the world of institutional finance after a dozen years of dealmaking and became an entrepreneur, starting a number of healthcare businesses both in the USA and China. He has recently returned to his hometown of New York City and is concentrating on writing.

Bromme obtained his BA from Boston University and an MS from New York University.
